Please let me know by Monday.

Warm regards,

The Vegetable Stamp Bag

Hina's art class had an interesting project in October: each student received a plain white cloth tote bag and had to decorate it using natural shapes. At first, Hina thought about pressing autumn leaves onto the cloth, just like many of her classmates.

That evening, while helping her father make curry, Hina watched him cut off the bottom of a green okra pod and the root end of a lotus root. When she looked at the leftover pieces on the cutting board, she noticed something surprising. The cut okra looked like a neat five-pointed star, and the lotus root had a ring of pretty holes like a flower!

Hina asked her father if she could wash and dry those vegetable ends instead of throwing them away. The next day in art class, she dipped the okra and lotus root into fabric paint—yellow, green, and dark blue—and stamped patterns across her bag.

Her classmates gathered around her desk in amazement. Hina gave the finished bag to her father so he could carry vegetables home from the market every week.
