Keeping Migrating Birds Safe Around Glass Buildings

Modern office buildings and school libraries often feature wide glass windows that fill indoor rooms with natural daylight. While bright interiors save electricity and create pleasant spaces for people, large sheets of clear glass pose an unexpected danger to wild birds. Because glass reflects nearby trees and clouds like a mirror, migrating birds frequently mistake windows for open sky and fly into them.

For many years, building managers tried sticking a single black hawk silhouette onto large windows to scare birds away. Wildlife researchers eventually discovered that this method rarely worked: birds simply flew around the sticker and struck the rest of the glass. What birds actually need is a subtle visual pattern spaced no more than a palm's width apart, signaling that (21).

Today, several cities encourage schools and offices to apply rows of tiny white ceramic dots or frosted stripes across exterior glass. From inside a classroom, people can still enjoy clear outdoor views almost unchanged, yet birds perceive a solid barrier from several meters away. Early trials at a lakeside high school showed that collisions dropped by over eighty percent in a single autumn, proving that (22).

1 insects are hiding inside the classroom

2 all trees around the building have been cut down

3 nighttime lights will stay on all winter

4 the entire surface cannot be flown through

1 removing every window is the only way to protect wildlife

2 small design adjustments can protect birds without darkening rooms

3 hawk stickers remain the most effective solution available

4 migrating birds never fly near lakes in autumn

From: Clara Bennett, Regional Youth Choir Coordinator
To: Participating High School Choir Leaders
Subject: Next Saturday's joint concert at Civic Concert Hall

Dear choir leaders,
We are delighted that eight high school choirs will gather at Civic Concert Hall next Saturday, November 7, for our annual Autumn Choral Exchange. Please share the following final details with your members before Wednesday.

Although the public performance begins at 1:30 p.m., all choirs must check in at the north stage entrance between 9:45 a.m. and 10:15 a.m. Each school will have strictly twelve minutes on stage during the morning acoustic check, followed by a combined rehearsal of the closing song with all two hundred singers at 11:40 a.m.

Dressing rooms on the basement level are shared by two schools each, so please ask students not to bring large wheeled suitcases. Choirs may wear either their regular school uniforms or black-and-white concert attire; however, shoes with hard metal heels are prohibited by the hall manager because they scratch the cedar stage floor.

Finally, audience admission is free, and family members do not need tickets, though recording videos with tripods in the aisles is not allowed for fire-safety reasons. Let me know by Thursday evening if your pianist requires a page turner.

Warmly,
Clara Bennett

Why Public Libraries Are Lending Household Tools

When people think of a public library, they naturally picture rows of novels, study desks, and children's picture books. Over the past decade, however, dozens of municipal libraries have quietly added a very different section: shelves stocked with electric drills, sewing machines, hedge trimmers, and kitchen food dehydrators that residents can borrow with an ordinary library card.

The idea grew out of a simple observation about modern apartments. Many tools are essential for an occasional task, such as putting up a bookshelf, hemming curtains, or pruning a backyard tree, yet sit unused in closets for the other 364 days of the year. Buying decent equipment is expensive, and small apartments rarely have extra storage space. Sharing durable tools across a neighborhood reduces both household spending and manufacturing waste.

In the port city of Westhaven, the central library launched its "Tool Corner" three years ago with forty donated items inspected by retired electricians and carpenters. Before borrowing power tools for the first time, residents watch a five-minute safety video and sign an agreement promising to return items clean. A modest late fee encourages borrowers to bring popular items back on schedule so weekend projects are not delayed for the next person.

Interestingly, library staff noticed an unexpected benefit. Residents who visited initially to borrow a sewing machine or bicycle repair stand often left with craft manuals, gardening guides, or cookbooks as well, bringing first-time adult visitors into the building.

Running a tool library still requires dedicated space and regular maintenance checks, so not every small branch can store heavy garden equipment. Even so, Westhaven's experience shows that libraries have always been about sharing knowledge and practical resources that strengthen daily community life.

4B Why Public Libraries Are Lending Household Tools　設問 (26)〜(29)

(26) Why does lending household tools make sense for people living in apartments?

1 Apartment residents repair bookshelves every single day of the year.

2 Useful tools can be costly and take up scarce closet space when rarely used.

3 Hardware stores are no longer allowed to sell sewing machines.

4 Power tools work better inside library reading rooms.

(27) What must Westhaven residents do the first time they borrow a power tool?

1 Donate two tools of their own to the central library.

2 Pass a two-hour written exam given by carpenters.

3 Pay half the retail price of the machine in cash.

4 Watch a short safety video and sign a clean-return agreement.

(28) What unexpected effect did the Tool Corner have on the central library?

1 Children stopped borrowing picture books on weekends.

2 Book circulation dropped by forty percent.

3 Retired carpenters moved their workshops inside the study hall.

4 People who came for tools also started borrowing related how-to books.

(29) What limitation of tool libraries does the author mention in the final paragraph?

1 Maintaining and storing large tools is difficult for every small branch.

2 Library cards cannot be used by adults.

3 Books and tools can never be kept in the same city.

4 Nobody ever returns hedge trimmers on time.
