Borrowing Grandpa's Binoculars

From: Grandpa
To: Rina
Subject: Binoculars and bird checklist for your forest trip!

Dear Rina,
Your dad mentioned that your eighth-grade class is going to Mount Akagi for nature observation next Wednesday! You're very welcome to use my lightweight birdwatching binoculars.

When you spot a bird in a tree, don't lift the binoculars right away—keep your eyes fixed on the branch first, and bring the eyepieces up to your eyes without looking down! That little trick makes finding small birds ten times easier.

Come over on Sunday afternoon so we can adjust the neck strap to fit you, and stay for your grandma's strawberry shortcake!

Love,
Grandpa

Borrowing Grandpa's Binoculars — Questions

(23) Where is Rina's class going next Wednesday?

1 To a foreign airport.

2 To an indoor swimming contest.

3 To a marine aquarium by ferry.

4 To Mount Akagi for nature observation.

(24) What tip does Grandpa share for spotting birds easily with binoculars?

1 Keep looking at the branch and raise the binoculars to your eyes without looking away.

2 Close both eyes and spin around twice.

3 Run toward the tree while shouting.

4 Look only at your feet first.

(25) Why does Grandpa invite Rina over on Sunday afternoon?

1 To plant twenty apple trees.

2 To wash Grandpa's car in the rain.

3 To buy a new camera at the mall.

4 To adjust the neck strap and enjoy Grandma's strawberry shortcake.

The Lunchtime Weather Broadcast

When fourteen-year-old Shun joined the broadcasting committee at Aoba Junior High School, his Tuesday job was reading a two-minute weather forecast during lunch. At first, Shun simply copied numbers from a weather website—"Sunny tomorrow, high of twenty-six degrees, twenty percent chance of rain"—and noticed that nobody in the classrooms really listened.

One rainy afternoon, the baseball captain complained that players never knew whether the clay infield would dry in time for after-school practice. That gave Shun an idea. With advice from his science teacher, Mr. Hori, Shun began checking wind speed and morning humidity on the school's rooftop weather sensor and translating raw numbers into practical school tips.

Instead of dry figures, Tuesday broadcasts sounded lively: "Strong west breeze this afternoon—the tennis courts should dry by three-thirty, and bicyclists riding east will have a tailwind home!" Art club members painting outdoors and students hanging laundry at home soon started tuning in eagerly.

By autumn, three seventh graders asked to join the committee after hearing Shun's broadcasts, teaching him that useful information begins with imagining the listener's day.

The Lunchtime Weather Broadcast — Questions

(26) Why didn't classmates pay much attention to Shun's broadcasts at first?

1 His microphone was broken every Tuesday.

2 He simply read plain temperature and rain numbers copied from a website.

3 He spoke only in German.

4 Lunch break lasted only three minutes.

(27) What sparked Shun's idea to change his weather reports?

1 A thunderstorm that broke a classroom window.

2 A letter from a famous TV announcer.

3 A comment from the baseball captain about not knowing if the field would dry.

4 A trip to a mountain ski resort.

(28) Who gave Shun advice on using the rooftop weather sensor?

1 His science teacher, Mr. Hori.

2 His younger sister.

3 A local bus driver.

4 The baseball team's coach from another school.

(29) How did Shun make his Tuesday forecasts more helpful to students?

1 He played loud rock drums for ten minutes.

2 He turned weather data into practical tips for clubs and cyclists going home.

3 He read next month's lunch menu instead of weather.

4 He canceled all outdoor club practices himself.

(30) What happened by autumn as a result of Shun's improved broadcasts?

1 Three seventh graders asked to join the broadcasting committee.

2 Shun quit the committee to play tennis.

3 The school removed the rooftop sensor.

4 Tuesday lunch breaks were canceled.
