Grandpa's Wooden Birdhouse

During spring break, twelve-year-old Mao stayed with her grandparents in Nagano for four days. Behind their house stood two tall apple trees. Every morning, Mao heard small wild birds singing in the branches, so she wanted to watch them more closely.

On the second day, her grandfather opened his small workshop and showed Mao some clean cedar boards left over from repairing a fence. "Why don't we build a birdhouse together?" he asked. He taught Mao how to measure the wood carefully with a metal ruler and smooth the edges with sandpaper.

Her grandfather made one important point: the round entrance hole had to be just three centimeters wide. If the hole was too big, crows might reach inside; if it was too small, even little chickadees could not enter. They hung the finished birdhouse on the lower branch of an apple tree and placed a dish of water nearby.

Before Mao went home on the fourth morning, a pair of small gray-and-white birds flew into the box carrying dry moss. Mao took a photo from the window and promised to visit again in summer.

(34) What did they put near the birdhouse?

1 A big mirror.
