A Different Kind of Team

When Hana joined her school's outdoor club, she expected to spend every weekend hiking in the mountains. At the first meeting, however, the leader announced that the club would help make a walking trail near the town library. Hana was disappointed. She thought working close to home would be less exciting than visiting distant places.

On the first workday, the members met Mr. Lee, who used a wheelchair. He explained that the old trail was too narrow and uneven for him to use. The club's task was not simply to make the path look nicer. It was to (21). Hana had never considered that a small change to a path could make such a difference.

The work took several weeks. The members measured the path, removed stones, and built a resting area. At the opening event, Mr. Lee traveled along the new trail with his family. Watching them, Hana realized that the project had been (22). She still enjoyed mountain trips, but she now understood why the leader had chosen this local activity.

1 make the trail accessible to more people
2 move the library closer to the mountains
3 teach families to repair wheelchairs
4 prevent anyone from entering the area

1 a way to avoid outdoor work
2 more meaningful than she had expected
3 finished before any work was done
4 too difficult for the club to complete

Changes to the Food Festival

From: Luis, Festival Coordinator
To: Volunteers
Subject: Please read before Saturday

Dear volunteers,
Thank you for helping at our international food festival. There have been two important changes. First, heavy rain is expected, so the festival will take place inside the community center rather than in the park. The center has enough space for all the food tables, but the entrance is narrow. Please arrive at the back door to help move supplies.

Second, the local bus company cannot provide the extra morning service we requested. Some visitors may arrive later than planned. We will therefore begin serving food at 11:30 instead of 11:00. Volunteers should still arrive at 9:00, as originally arranged. We need that time to set up the tables and check the kitchen equipment.

If you are helping at a food table, please bring a clean apron. We will provide gloves and name tags. Volunteers at the information desk do not need aprons. Those who have not yet chosen a job should contact me by Thursday evening.

Finally, please avoid bringing your own cars because parking spaces must be kept for delivery vehicles. The number 6 bus stops directly outside the center. I will send a map with the entrance marked tomorrow.

Best wishes,
Luis

(24) What should volunteers do at 9:00 on Saturday?

1 Start selling meals immediately.

2 Welcome the first bus passengers.

3 Choose their jobs at the desk.

4 Begin preparing the venue as planned.

(25) What does Luis ask volunteers to avoid?

1 Driving to the community center.

2 Using the number 6 bus.

3 Wearing gloves at food tables.

4 Entering through the back door.

A Museum You Can Hear

At the Riverside Museum, most visitors once followed signs from one glass case to another. They read short descriptions of old tools, clothes, and furniture, then moved on. The objects were interesting, but the museum staff noticed that many visitors did not stay long. Few people understood how the objects had been used in daily life.

To change this, the museum invited local residents to record stories about familiar objects. One woman described the sound of the sewing machine her mother used at home. A retired baker explained why a wooden tray had a particular shape. These recordings were added to a small audio player that visitors could borrow at the entrance. The aim was not to replace the written descriptions but to provide another way to explore the collection.

The first recordings were long and difficult to follow. Staff had assumed that visitors would listen to complete interviews. In practice, people wanted to move at their own speed. The museum therefore divided the interviews into short sections. Each section focused on one object and lasted less than two minutes. Visitors could choose only the stories that interested them.

The new system also changed the relationship between the museum and the town. Residents who had rarely visited came to hear their relatives' recordings. Some brought photographs or offered to share their own memories. The museum checked these stories against old records before using them, because personal memories are not always exact.

A visitor survey later showed that people were spending more time in the museum. However, the director did not regard longer visits as the only sign of success. She was more pleased that visitors were asking new questions about everyday life in the past. The museum now plans to add stories from younger residents as well. The staff believe that objects which seem ordinary today may help future visitors understand the present.

A Museum You Can Hear — Questions

(26) What problem did the museum staff first notice?

1 Visitors could not find the entrance.

2 Visitors did not understand the objects' connection to daily life.

3 The collection contained only photographs.

4 Local residents wanted fewer written signs.

(27) Why were the interviews divided into short sections?

1 The audio players could hold only one story.

2 The residents refused to record long interviews.

3 Visitors preferred to choose stories and move at their own pace.

4 Written descriptions had to be removed.

(28) Why did the museum compare residents' stories with old records?

1 To decide which residents should pay an entrance fee.

2 To prove that photographs were unnecessary.

3 To avoid including stories about ordinary objects.

4 To check details that people might remember incorrectly.

(29) What pleased the director most?

1 Visitors became more curious about everyday life in the past.

2 All visitors listened to every recording.

3 The museum no longer needed staff.

4 Only older residents contributed stories.
