From: Daiki
To: Shun
Subject: Thank you for the hiking poles!

Hi Shun,
Thank you so much for lending me your lightweight hiking poles for my family's climb up Mount Akagi yesterday! Walking down the rocky trail in the afternoon was much easier on my knees thanks to them. I wiped off all the mud and dried them carefully last night.

I wanted to bring them to your classroom this morning, but they were too long to fit inside my school locker, so I left them at home. Since our houses are only ten minutes apart, may I drop by your house around 5:30 p.m. tomorrow after my badminton practice?

Also, my parents bought a box of walnut cookies at a mountain shop near the trailhead. I'll bring some for you and your sister tomorrow! Let me know if 5:30 p.m. is convenient for your family.

See you at school,
Daiki

Returning Your Hiking Poles　設問 (23)〜(25)

(23) How did Shun's hiking poles help Daiki yesterday?

1 They kept rain off his backpack.

2 They fit inside his small school locker.

3 They helped him find a mountain shop in the dark.

4 They made walking down the rocky trail easier on his knees.

(24) Why didn't Daiki bring the poles to school this morning?

1 They were too long to put in his school locker.

2 He forgot where Shun's classroom was.

3 He had not wiped the mud off them yet.

4 His father used them again this morning.

(25) What will Daiki bring to Shun's house tomorrow besides the poles?

1 Two badminton rackets borrowed from his club.

2 A trail map of Mount Akagi from the shop.

3 A spare key for Shun's school locker.

4 Some walnut cookies bought near the mountain.

Letters Across Three Oceans

When Ms. Carter became the English teacher at Harbor Junior High School in April, many eighth-grade students felt shy about writing in English. Whenever she asked them to write three sentences in their notebooks, they worried so much about making small grammar mistakes that their pages stayed almost blank.

In May, Ms. Carter arranged a pen-pal project with two partner schools (one in New Zealand and one in Portugal) where students were also learning English as a global language. Instead of exchanging instant text messages, each student designed a handmade postcard introducing one local food or seasonal event from their town. Because space on a postcard was small, students felt relaxed and focused on sharing one clear idea.

When the first bundle of colorful cards arrived from New Zealand and Portugal in June, the classroom grew lively. Harbor students noticed that their new friends occasionally crossed out a word or used simple sentences, yet their drawings and descriptions of winter rugby matches in June and grilled sardine festivals were vivid and easy to enjoy.

Realizing that communication mattered more than perfection, the students began writing longer letters in autumn. Several students looked up English words on their own to explain how their town celebrated the autumn harvest.

At the end of the term, the class displayed copies of the postcards on the hallway board with a world map and yarn connecting the three towns. Even students who once feared writing three lines now look forward to opening the mail bag every month.

(26) Why did many eighth-grade students leave their notebook pages almost blank in April?

1 They did not have any pens or pencils.

2 They were afraid of making small grammar mistakes.

3 Ms. Carter asked them to write twenty pages.

4 They wanted to study Portuguese instead of English.

(27) Why did making postcards help the students feel relaxed at first?

1 Ms. Carter wrote all the sentences for them.

2 They only needed to draw pictures without any words.

3 The small space let them focus on sharing one clear idea.

4 The postcards were never sent to another country.

(28) What did Harbor students realize when they read the first cards from abroad?

1 New Zealand had hot summer weather in June.

2 Students in Portugal never made any mistakes.

3 Handmade postcards were too difficult to read.

4 Clear communication was more important than writing without any mistakes.

(29) How did the students change in autumn?

1 They flew to New Zealand during lunch break.

2 They threw away the world map in the hallway.

3 They stopped learning English and closed the project.

4 They started writing longer letters and looking up words by themselves.

(30) What did the class put on the hallway board at the end of the term?

1 Copies of the postcards and a world map linking the three towns with yarn.

2 Traditional dishes and rugby jerseys sent by the two overseas partner schools.

3 The first notebooks from April showing how students practiced English grammar.

4 Information sheets about summer study-abroad flights to Portugal and New Zealand.
